but sample bias is a concern. It is not unusual for a study to use only the "best" (i.e., strongest) cases of a disease or condition, or only the "best" (i.e., healthiest) cases of a population. This can lead to a biased sample that does not represent the general population. For example, a study of the health of a community that only included the healthiest members of the community would likely find that the community was healthier than it actually is.
