- The outcome probabilities of different realizations of processes in the two experiments will always be correlated by some function.
  - The probability distribution function for different realizations of the two experiments are identical.
  - The two experiments are using exactly the same principles, so it is possible to deduce the properties of one from the other.
  - The two experiments are independent, so they can't depend on each other or share information about their outcomes.
  - The two experiments have different probabilities for different outcomes.
  - The two experiments follow different distributions. So if all outcomes had the same probability, we know nothing for sure about the two experiments.
